

Mark Twain's "Connecticut Yankee" Seminar

Alan Kitty recently led his "Connecticut Yankee" Seminar for Sanofi Aventis. He is pictured here with one of those fellows, who thinks man will eventually learn how to fly. Twain's early experience with the idea was the lighter-than-air ship Avitor. It flew in 1869 with the help of helium and burned the next year. We have since learned how to fly without burning up, but the experience is no less painful and inconvenient.

Corporate audiences know Kitty's Twain as an honored guest speaker, and through his Team Building seminar based on Twain's "Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court." With 35 years in sales, operations and project management, Kitty knows first hand how a lack of effective communications and understanding between groups in any organization can affect the bottom line.

That is why he developed his lunchtime seminar series. It helps teams think differently about their colleagues and their companies. The session is boldly different from all other approaches to this common problem. It boosts creative thinking in problem solving. The goal is better cooperation and better bottom line results.

Alan Kitty began performing as Twain in 1979. His theatrical monolog, "Mark Twain's Last Stand," was written in 2007 and has been seen Off Broadway and on tour in more than 150 performances. This original theatrical creation was directed by Charles Messina, known for his deconstructionist approach to one-person shows including "Mercury Rising," "Jackie O," and other award-winning shows. Reviewers and audiences alike hailed the show as "a work of genius..." NY Newswire's Larry Lit deemed it "Well worth the VIsit.." Meanwhile, Glamwire pronounced Last Stand "Brilliant."
